Why Vaccines are Important

We all love our pets and want to keep them healthy for as long as possible. Regular vaccinations play a crucial role in maintaining health and longevity. Vaccines help to protect pets from several potential life threatening diseases.

Even today, with advances in veterinary care, pets can succumb to distemper, parvovirus, influenza and even complications from kennel cough and feline upper respiratory viruses.

Since there is no evidence that the current recommended vaccine schedule is in any way detrimental to pets, there is no reason not to continue giving them.

Rabies is an always present threat to both pets and people. All of these diseases are preventable or, if contracted despite having the proper vaccines, the disease process is much less severe and much easier to treat. Our vaccine recommendations will vary depending on your pet's risk assessment and current AAHA vaccination guidelines.

So contact your veterinarian to be sure that your pet is up-to-date for any necessary vaccines.
